Mr. Lauzon was born June 5, 1936, at Port Blakely to Earnest and Irene (Rogers) Rasmussen. He lived at the Martha & Mary Children's Orphanage in Poulsbo and was adopted in 1942 by Jerome and Agnes Lauzon. He was raised in Port Orchard and attended Port Orchard High School. He married Ruth Newell. They later divorced. On Dec. 31, 1980, he married Jane Stopen. She survives him at their home. Mr. Lauzon had owned fishing boats since 1952. From 1970-75, he worked for Interstate Asphalt as a mechanic/welder. From 1976-88, he was a crane operator and welder at the Satsop nuclear plant and on the Alaska Pipeline, working for Morrison Knudsen, Quigg Brothers-McDonald and several other companies through Operating Engineers No. 302. He was also a cast member of the television series "Northern Exposure." Mr. Lauzon was a life member of the Snoqualmie/Snoqualmoo Tribe, Affiliated Tribes of Northwest Indians and National Congress of American Indians. He was Snoqualmoo Natural Resources director, past chairman of the Snoqualmie Tribe and sub-chief and co-chairman of the Snoqualmie Falls Preservation Task Force. His memberships also included the Grays Harbor League of Women Voters, Hoquiam Elks No. 1082 and Elma Eagles No. 1440. He had been secretary-treasurer of the Puget Sound Salmon Commission and an election board worker, as well. Mr. Lauzon, a direct descendant of Pat and John Kanim, signers of the Point Elliot Treaty of 1855, worked with the local, state and federal government to gain support for federal recognition of the Snoqualmie Tribe. He enjoyed having salmon barbecues and had smoked salmon for many Quinault fisherman and other Washington tribal members. He also enjoyed wood-carving, making drums, going to casinos, golfing, traveling in his motor home, attending his great-grandchildren's activities and Hyak ballgames at Ocean Shores. He liked making wind chimes from fishing lures for his family.
